

Designing a Better Tomorrow

With work and life entering a new post-pandemic era, we have a historic opportunity to reimagine the role of the modern workplace. MillerKnoll can help your organization seize this opportunity to better support flexible working and offer greater value to employees now and in the future.

Flexibility is an expectation, not a perk

Place design principles

Places that matter start with people. Understanding how people perceive the world is a prerequisite for creating places that matter.

Places that matter strengthen community. We can shape places to strengthen connection by facilitating activities that bring people together.

Places that matter feel inclusive and personal. The expression of a place should be based upon the unique cultures, communities, and individuals who will use it every day.

Places that matter get better over time. When we create places that matter, we invest capital, time, thought, energy, and emotion in their continuous improvement.

Experiences across the continuum of workplace

Work is what we do, not where we do it. We can help you rethink the modern workplace to deliver what people want from the office while supporting WFH.

Communities at work
Spaces that support informal social interactions or where people from different groups can assemble and work alongside each other help build community.

Groups at work
Spaces designed for information-sharing or the dynamic nature of collaboration provide the flexibility that groups need to take advantage of co-location.

Individuals at work
Spaces highly sought-after by individuals who have chosen to come into the office support restoration and focus through privacy and quiet.

Working from home
The home office is a critical piece of supporting the work experience for hybrid workers.

How MillerKnoll can help

- 1 Engage your people in dialogue about their work experience.
- 2 Leverage feedback from conversations with your people to inform workplace strategy.
- 3 Pilot new workplace settings or experiences based on outcome of those engagements.

Contact me today to get started.