Some key points to consider

- Users are asking for much more flexibility in where and when they work. Future Forum Research shows they want time flexibility is more important than place flexibility
- There are differences between Industries as well as the way different countries across the world are managing the post pandemic workplace
- Companies are having to think about how they support work differently – wherever that might be, home office or somewhere in between
- Clients are on a journey from bewilderment to enlightenment – find out where they are at, to find out what support they need
- Many are asking for case studies, but it is too soon to provide case studies with evidence. We can share stories. In fact, why not share what you have heard with us? Send emails to mark_catchlove@hermanmiller.com
- "Hybrid" is used widely by the workplace industry, but it is often interpreted differently. When a client or designer uses the term, ask the to clarify what they mean.
- As clients explore what is next, they will look at many options include physical and digital pilots. They will use this to monitor, measure and manage what is working. This presents us with a great opportunity engage
- Many companies have critical events on their horizon, like lease breaks or renewals. This is the time they are potentially open to talking to us beyond the furniture. This includes those who we have supplied in the past and the bids we lost 5 or 10 years ago! They might reduce the footprint, but up the standard and quality of the interior
